Initiating with the 2000 U.S. Census, the Census Bureau's question on race was revised to allow respondents the option to self-identify themselves by selecting one or more races to indicate their racial identities. Due to the change, data on race is presented using different tabulation options. One option provides data on "race alone," those who reported a single race category. The other option reports those who designated a single category and those who designated multiple categories, "alone or in any combination." Due to the change, data on race from Census 2000, subsequent censuses, and the American Community Survey (ACS) are not directly comparable with those from the 1990 and previous censuses. Moreover, those who identified themselves by a single race category does not indicate they are of a single race. Consequently, those who are classified as "Hawaiian alone," does not indicate that they are "full-blooded Hawaiian" and any data should not be interpreted as such.
